Course Description:

The purpose of the Fragile Infant Feeding Institute is to assist professionals in understanding the story of the infant, both in the hospital and beyond. Everyone involved in the care of the infant and family should understand the factors influencing successful, enjoyable feedings, across time and across disciplines. Feeding is supported both by the development and functioning of the infant and the experiences (history) during feedings. The parents are the lifelong partners in this story. Collaborating with the family, emphasizing their intrinsic strengths and knowledge, optimizes infant outcomes. NICU and Early Intervention professionals must work together integrally to improve feedings and feeding outcomes. We emphasize the complex interplay between nutrition, lactation, therapy, medical/nursing, mental health, and family desires and choices. We welcome professionals to come, study, and interact with us, and reflect upon their current practice within their system.

The Fragile Infant Feeding Institute is a four and a half day intensive study of feeding and nutrition for infants with special needs. FIFI 2017 is held in an environment that allows for close interaction between faculty and participants. Participating faculty represent a variety of perspectives from both research and clinical backgrounds, and provide evidence-based research with a focus on practical application.

This course expands the knowledge base of professionals caring for infants with feeding and nutrition challenges. The development of feeding skills and the impact of early nutrition and feeding experiences is discussed in the context of developmentally appropriate and family centered care. Based on concepts adapted from the Synactive theory, the Newborn Individualized Developmental Care & Assessment Program (NIDCAP) and the Family Infant Relationship Support Training (FIRST) program, the Institute provides a sound foundation for observation and assessment of developing feeding skills. Supportive interventions for infants while in the hospital, as well as during the transition to home are addressed. The Institute places a special emphasis on feeding and nutritional issues through the transition to supplementary (baby) foods. The nutritional needs of premature infants and those with special medical needs, as well as the interaction between feeding skills and nutritional needs are discussed. Presenters represent the disciplines of nursing, nutrition, therapy, parenting, and psychology. Each day successively builds on the knowledge and information from the previous day. An interactive process with the faculty results in the participant applying the information during the four and a half day Institute.

Needs Assessment:

A common challenge in the NICU, especially with very premature infants, is feeding. Typically the focus is on quantity, and subsequent growth of the infant. However, an argument can be made that focus should be on the quality of the feeding skills over quantity of food consumed. "...Many studies show that infants who develop feeding problems are averse to food and feeding...repeated experiences solidify over time into behavioral repertoires, and therefore the quality of the feeding experience should also be measured...". This course seeks to close the gap on feeding challenges by focusing on the neurodevelopmental aspects of infant feeding, supporting the infant-parent relationship, and the development of systems to enhance practice behaviors.

Learner Objectives:

As a result of participation in this activity, participants should be able to:

- Describe neurodevelopmental issues that impact appropriate nutrition and feeding for infants with special needs;
- Utilize assessment and intervention techniques to support optimal growth of infants with special needs;
- Identify nutritional requirements for at-risk infants in the NICU and after hospital discharge;
- Demonstrate both individual and collaborative expertise with other professionals and families in support of better growth for infants;
- Develop an individual and/or team action plan;
- List three new professional and / or parent contacts that have the potential to collaborate on current or future projects, or to assist with problem-solving.

Learner Objectives apply to all members of the target audience.
