EMERGENCIES IN THE CANCER PATIENT 2018

Oncologic emergencies has become a rapidly evolving field in medicine over the last ten years. In addition to the treatment of complications related to the standard and traditional chemotherapies, the development of numerous new cancer treatment modalities present a whole new field of patient complaints that are just now starting to be seen at emergency rooms across the country. With very few dedicated cancer hospital emergency rooms across the country, patients presenting with cancer emergencies are often inappropriately diagnosed, undertreated, or often times simply referred back to their respective oncologist without resolution of their emergent complaints.

We bring together specialists from across all areas of the cancer treatment spectrum in order to update and enhance emergency room providers and staff on how to prepare for common & not-so-common emergency scenarios with which the patient could present.

Educational Objectives

- Identify and recognize the most common presenting complaints of a cancer patient in the emergency room.
- Identify current and developing cancer therapeutics with respect to their side-effects and complications.
- Recognize the current limitations and challenges that remain in efficiently addressing the emergent needs of the cancer patient.

Target Audience

This course is intended for physicians, nurse practitioners, physician assistants, and registered nurses involved in the treatment and management of patients with active malignancies/cancers who present with acute illnesses in an emergency type setting.
