Sponsored by

This presentation explores the powerful role music can play in helping people process loss, transition, and grief. Research in psychology, neuroscience, and music therapy shows that music can support emotional expression while reducing stress and fostering meaning during periods of bereavement and life changes. Studies have also highlighted its value for caregivers and helping professionals, noting that musical engagement can buffer cognitive overload, support memory, and provide critical periods of rest and restorative emotional space.

To bring these ideas and concepts to life, the session will feature both a presenter and live musical performances by three well-known Austin musicians: Ruthie Craft, Jo James, and Marco Gutierrez. All will be sharing their songs and related influences relevant to loss, life's transitions, and the many phases of grief. Their music will serve not only as illustration, but as an experiential reminder of how art can help us move through the difficult moments that Needs Based Financial Analysis: How Long will the Money Last?

What is a depletion analysis and why should I have one for every client? A depletion analysis is a financial plan that shows how long the money will last while taking into account the income and expenses of your client. This presentation takes a person-centered planning approach by letting the goals and aspirations of the beneficiary dictate how a guardian/trustee manages the resources for the beneficiary/ward. It sounds simple, but if you do the right thing for the client, you will feel good at night all while protecting your practice from litigation. Furthermore, you will be able to show the court or other interested parties the goals and aspirations you analyzed before you made a final decision for the beneficiary/ward.

Hiring Right - Interviewing Best Practices That Scale

Many practices hire based on license or title, only to later discover misalignment in values and behaviors. This session introduces a streamlined, skills-based interview system that uses structured interview scorecards to drive alignment and consistency. Attendees will learn how to define values as observable behaviors, apply culture and skills scorecards, run structured and repeatable interviews, and conduct reference checks that validate evidence rather than intuition. The result is a stronger interview process and greater confidence in hiring decisions that build high-performing teams and support long-term practice growth.
