16:10 - 19:00 Alternative Approaches for Presurgical Infant Orthopedics (PSIO): An International Experience

Objective:

Cleft lip repair and the correction of the associated nasal deformity is challenging even for experienced cleft surgeons. For unilateral deformities, the cleft lip affects nasal anatomy and symmetry, and the maxilla and alveolus are distorted due to the cleft itself and abnormal muscle forces impacting both the greater and lesser segments. For bilateral cases, the nose is fairly symmetrical, with the premaxilla protruded/deviated/rotated with retro-positioned and/or hypoplastic lateral maxillary segments. Wider clefts are associated with more significant nasolabial deformities, and reconstruction tends to yield suboptimal outcomes. Thus, presurgical infant orthopedics (PSIO) is used to reduce cleft severity and improve nasal form and symmetry to ease and improve the results of the primary operation.

Presurgical nasoalveolar molding (NAM) is considered an effective form of PSIO. It has been reported that greater nasal symmetry is obtained after cleft lip repair using NAM therapy. In addition NAM has been shown to be a cost-effective method to facilitate primary cleft lip repair when patients are followed long-term.

However, NAM can be labor intensive for both the dental specialists and the parents. Weekly clinic visits for adjustments are needed to slowly shape the cleft alveolus, lip, and nose, while paying attention to untoward effects on the soft tissues covered by the appliance. From the caregiver perspective, the failure to complete NAM therapy is increased in families affected by socioeconomic barriers to care. An increased rate of non-compliance in patients with bilateral cleft lip deformities, who present complications during the treatment or whose primary caregiver is less than 30 years old, has been reported. In addition, only a small number of dental specialists are trained in the procedure. All these factors compromise the NAM treatment protocol, especially in developing low and middle-income countries.
